

Can journalists publish "stolen" information?

By Jacques Louw

18 May 2023

South African law says yes, if it is in the public interest - which is not the same thing as interesting.

Both the Constitution and legal precedent allow journalists to publish information that is in the public interest, even if that information was obtained unlawfully. Illustration: Lisa Nelson / GroundUp

What happens when a whistleblower decides to copy and steal an employer's secret information and give it to the media? Two recent stories, in America and South Africa, brought this question to the fore.

Everything about Donald J Trump is big — a Wikipedia page is dedicated to his litigation list alone. One of these piqued particular media interest. In 2021 Trump sued his niece Mary Trump, the New York Times, and journalists, following the publication by the Times of a series of articles based on Trump's tax records. Trump argued that Mary had obtained the documents from her lawyer in breach of a 20-year-old confidentiality agreement. Trump's argument against the Times was that they induced Mary to commit the unlawful conduct and thereby committed the act of unlawful interference (called tortious interference in America). He sued for $100,000,000 (more than R1.8bn).

On 3 May 2023, Judge Robert Reed of the Supreme Court of the State of New York dismissed Trump's case "because the Times' purpose in reporting on a story of high public interest constitutes justification as a matter of law." Constitutionally protected freedom of speech trumped the unlawfulness of the confidentiality breach. The case against Mary continues.

Journalist imprisonments highest recorded in years

15 Dec 2022

The ink was still wet on the Trump ruling, when we heard locally that Sam Sole, Micah Reddy and Dewald van Rensburg from amaBhungane Centre for Investigative Journalism are under attack after they published an exposé implicating Zunaïd

Moti in a mining deal with Zimbabwe's President Emmerson Mnangagwa. Moti complains that the journalists used stolen documents for the publication. Will the South Africa Constitution protect amaBhungane under the right to freedom of expression and media freedom, like the US Constitution protected the Times?

In 1990, the Financial Mail obtained information about private business discussions between Sage Holdings and the Allied Group in the form of unlawfully recorded private telephone conversations. The Financial Mail decided to publish an article based on this. Sage successfully applied for an interdict.

The case eventually got to the Supreme Court of Appeal, which, in 1993 confirmed the interdict. On the question when, if ever, unlawfully obtained material could be lawfully published, Chief Justice Michael Corbett said that, if, in the case of information obtained by means of an unlawful intrusion, the nature of the information is such that there are overriding grounds in favour of the public being informed, the Court would conclude that publication of that information should be permitted, despite its source or the manner in which it was obtained. The Court warned the media not to confuse public interest with what is interesting and to balance privacy with public interest. The Financial Mail failed to produce evidence of overriding public interest in the case, which is why it lost.

When is there an overriding public interest to publish the fruit of a poisoned tree?

In amaBhungane's case, they published using documents leaked by a former employee of the Moti Group. The documents tie Moti to the political elite of Zimbabwe in a relationship that, so it is alleged, smacks of political favours bought. To escape liability, whether it be for defamation, invasion of privacy or something else, Sole and his colleagues must prove that the overriding public interest in publishing trumps Moti's privacy and reputational rights.

Uganda court quashes part of law used against government critics

Elias Biryabarema 11 Jan 2023

In most cases where information is leaked, whether it is from a deep throat whispering in a dark alley or an employee sliding an envelope over a table, there is an act contrary to the wishes of the "owner" of the information. The act of deceit is potentially wrongful.

Public interest to justify the publication from the leaks would lie in the nature of the information – what it reveals – and the subject thereof – who it relates to. Take the Gupta-leaks. A hard drive was given to journalists. It exposed graft and corruption involving public bodies and the high-living Guptas. Few questioned the public interest.

Moti is a flamboyant businessman with a lavish public lifestyle. He has been in the limelight for over a decade. It is safe to describe him as a public figure. The leaked documents reveal deals between Moti's businesses and the President of Zimbabwe, a public figure and a controversial one to boot. These facts alone are strong indicators of public interest in private business deals. If the information goes further to expose transactions that are morally or legally questionable, it is likely that Judge Corbett's overriding public interest test would be met.

Therefore, South Africa common law and its Constitution should stand as strong as the American First Amendment when it comes to protecting the publication of unlawfully obtained material, provided there is sufficient public interest. The caveats being: do not confuse interesting with public interest and be mindful of privacy rights.

Jacques Louw is an attorney who specialises in media law. He is also GroundUp's lawyer.

This article was originally published on GroundUp.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Jacques Louw is an attorney who specialises in media law . He is also GroundUp's lawyer.

For more, visit: <https://www.bizcommunity.com>