

Why Africa should be on international SMEs' radars

International SMEs are not recognising Africa's growth potential; they prefer to trade with other emerging economies and recent findings indicate that SMEs are expected to generate up to 50% of revenues internationally by 2019.

©radub - Fotolia.com

According to an in-depth study conducted by the Economist Intelligence Unit (EIU) on behalf of DHL Express, approximately 40% of global SMEs (small and medium-sized enterprises) do not perceive Africa as a growth opportunity, despite the positive economic growth stories and growing middle class in the regions.

The report further reveals that while many multinationals and state-owned companies are actively taking advantage of the opportunities that Africa offers, SMEs still remain apprehensive and are choosing to trade with other emerging markets instead.

Untapped potential

Charles Brewer, MD of DHL Express Sub Saharan Africa, says that despite current challenges to attract global SME interest, the findings of the study highlight the untapped potential that still exists in the continent.

"The fact that SMEs expect to generate up to 50% of revenues internationally by 2019 is positive and highlights the opportunities for Africa from an investment and job creation perspective."

Market challenges

He says that according to the study, which surveyed 480 SME executives and experts from business lobbying groups, SMEs are deterred by Africa's low average consumer spend, cultural and infrastructure challenges, as well as inefficiencies such as corruption and political risk in the region.

He explains that overcoming different market environments is the biggest hurdle. The executives surveyed all cited as factors that deterred them from entering new markets the quality of a target market's infrastructure, the stability of its politics, administrative costs for establishing a local presence and cultural differences in doing business.

"The unfamiliarity of foreign markets received particular attention, with 84% of respondents describing understanding a target market's culture or language as important or very important in determining its attractiveness. This also explains why most SMEs often expand into markets that resemble their own.

One size does not fit all

"This is evident in Africa, as companies looking to expand into the continent, often make use of a 'one size fits all' approach. Due to the various cultures, languages and customs on the continent, vast amounts of research need to be done into each region, and the services and products need to be specifically tailored to each country. Africa is not one country."

In terms of expansion tactics, the survey shows that partnerships are an important consideration for SMEs. The study identified a number of innovative approaches in this area, such as piggybacking on another company's existing retail network to enter the sub-Saharan market in Africa.

SME agility an advantage

"A number of multinationals and corporates have experienced great success in Africa, DHL being a prime example. The good news for SMEs is that they have the advantage of being more agile to adapt quickly and exploit the opportunities available. An entrepreneurial spirit is vital for the success of small businesses. DHL started out as an SME in 1969 and the rest is history. We too have focused on partnerships in Africa and now have a retail presence of over 3500 outlets across Africa.

"We work with thousands of SMEs across Africa and have witnessed how these businesses are able to successfully establish a presence in the region. With the support of the right partners, a well-designed supply chain, clear understanding of their competitive strengths and the right mind-set, SMEs can break through any border and make the world their market," concludes Brewer.

For more, go to www.economistsinsights.com.

For more, visit: <https://www.bizcommunity.com>