

Five must do activities when visiting Mauritius

12 Apr 2018

Mauritius is not what I had expected. As our bus travelled from Mahebourg to Port Louis, the lush greens and palm trees reminded me of Port Shepstone.

A short four-hour flight brought us to a breathtaking, lush island with greens, blues, and other magical sunset hues around every corner.

For South Africans, the fact that we don't need a visa is also a big plus. It's no secret that our green border-crossing booklets aren't the most powerful ones in the world. So whenever I get the opportunity of skipping a visa process, I feel like I've won a small prize.

The Mauritius we see advertised here in South African newspapers and magazines mostly looks like a luxury island holiday destination for families and honeymooners. And even though that is definitely what the island offers, there is another side of Mauritius that I was privileged to experience on my recent visit.

Our lodging was not at a luxury resort, but instead at the lovely Hotel Le Suffren located in the Le Caudan Waterfront in the capital city, Port Louis.

Mauritians celebrate half a century of building a nation hand-in-hand lise van den Berg 20 Mar 2018

Here are some of my top to-dos when you travel to Mauritius:

1. Public beaches

Mauritius is well-known for its unblemished beaches, snorkelling, diving, water sports and the like. But where do you start? Which beaches should you go to?

If you're staying at a resort, it's easy. You simply roll out of bed, grab some brekkie, walk out of the hotel, and there you have a fabulous beach with all the necessary amenities at your disposal.

But how do you know which beaches to go to if you're not staying at a resort?

Luckily Mauritius has some fantastic public beaches that locals and travellers alike adore.

Amidst a jam-packed itinerary with the celebrations of Mauritius' 50 years of independence, our delightful bus driver from Connections managed to fit in some special stops along the way to (rather proudly) show us what the island has to offer its visitors.

From Mahebourg, Blue Bay public beach is a quick and easy drive. A big shady spot under the trees looks out over a calm bay with inviting turquoise waters. The perfect swimming beach with a vibrant sea life discoverable if you have swimming goggles and a snorkel.

Blue Bay is popular though, so don't expect too much peace and quiet - especially over weekends.

On our last morning, a friend and I decided to brave the public transport system and make our way to the closest public beach to enjoy our last morning in paradise before we headed back to South Africa. 32 rupees got us a ticket each and 45 minutes later we arrived at the peaceful, unspoilt, almost-private Mont Choisy beach lined with pine trees and equipped with spotless amenities.

Other great public beaches on the island include Pereybere, Le Morne, and La Cuvette, among others.

2. Unesco World Heritage sites

Mauritius is home to two Unesco World Heritage sites: Le Morne and Aapravasi Ghat.

Le Morne Cultural Landscape is a strange but incredible sight. This sanctuary commemorates the runaway slaves who committed suicide by jumping off the mountain as they saw the British approach the mountain. Little did they know they would be informed of the abolishment of slavery. It was declared a World Heritage site by Unesco in 2008.

Further up the west coast from Le Morne, in Port Louis, is a second Unesco World Heritage site named Aapravasi Ghat. This is the original immigration depot from where the modern indentured labour diaspora began.

This is where, when Mauritius was under British rule, half a million immigrants arrived between 1834 and 1920 to work in the sugar cane plantations. It is said that most Mauritians can trace their ancestors back to this site.

Image: Verushka Ramasami (www.spicegoddess.co.za)

Here you can expect to see some important original structural sections including the remains of kitchens, lavatories, a hospital block, housing sheds and a noteworthy flight of stairs down which every immigrant passed. After disembarkation, each new immigrant was photographed and registered. The site became a National Monument in 1987 and a World Heritage Site 19 years later.

3. Chamarel waterfall and Seven Coloured Earth

Chamarel is an area located South West of the island, actually quite close to Le Morne.

The drive took us up a lush, bendy mountain road and on our way, we passed pineapple and coffee plantations. We stopped at the Chamarel waterfall for a quick marvel at the roughly 100m-high waterfall, surrounded by a green jungle on all sides.

The waterfall is a testimony to the volcanic activity that lasted several million years and it highlights two lava flows of different ages.

The Seven Coloured Earth really is a unique geological site, but many people are disappointed when they get there as they imagine it being gigantic rolling hills of red, brown, violet, blue, green, purple, and yellow when, in fact, the area is relatively small.

Pictures can be misleading, friends. But even so, this wonderful sight of nature is quite unlike anything I've ever seen.

4. Rum tasting

Rather embarrassed by my ignorance, I was shocked to find out that Mauritius is rather big on rum. And it is quite literally the best rum I've ever tasted.

There are a couple of places that you can go to for rum tastings such as La Rhumerie de Chamarel and Château de Labourdonnais.

5. Explore Port Louis' markets

Walking distance from our hotel, we came across a bustling part of the city where locals make their way to and from work and stop by the market to stock up on fresh produce and other items.

There simply is no better way to get a feel for a new city than to explore by foot and see how locals do life.

Image: Iga Motylska (www.eagerjourneys.com)

And, in my opinion, Mauritians seem to do life pretty well.

Get there

We were guests of the Mauritius Tourism Promotion Authority (MTPA) on this specific trip, but flights would cost between R5,000 and R10,000 depending on the time of year and season. For more, go to the MTPA website.

ABOUT ILSE VAN DEN BERG

llse is a freelance journalist and editor with a passion for people & their stories (check out Passing Stories). She is also the editor of Go & Travel, a platform connecting all the stakeholders in the travel & tourismindustry. You can check out her work here and here. Contact llse through her website here.

"For the sake of Bree Street Culture - Matt Manning opens new wine bar - 5 Nov 2020

"Going to great lengths to tell the truth of the vine - 22 Feb 2019

"What to expect at Leopard's Leap's South African Table - 14 Jan 2019

"Biltong never tasted this good, thanks to Alto Rouge - 26 Cct 2018

"Benguela Cove: more than just a wine farm- 12 Sep 2018

View my profile and articles...

For more, visit: https://www.bizcommunity.com